ANON EVENT

In a moment of pure cringe, the hacker group, Anonymous, has released a threatening video targeting the disgraced Terra Luna ecosystem founder, Do Kwon. Cloaked in a black hoodie and clad in a Guy Fawkes mask, an Anonymous representative took to YouTube to express the group's disapproval of Do Kwon while promising redemption.

In the video, Anonymous takes aim at Do Kwon, accusing him of single-handedly scamming billions from investors. The video was a highlight reel of some of Do Kwon's less-than-flattering moments, such as calling his ecosystem contributors and critics “poor” and admitting that it would be entertaining to watch other projects fail.

Anonymous also restates industry rumors of Do Kwon making off with billions while the Terra Luna Ecosystem token holders have been left holding empty bags. Do Kwon has denied these accusations, but Anonymous cites testimony by a Terra employee, taken before the SEC, that Do Kwon was taking up to $80 million per month in profit.

During the downfall of Terra, it was revealed that Do Kwon was behind a prior failed stablecoin project called Basis Cash. The video recounts this, and alleges that Do Kwon had bad intentions from the start of his Terra project. While the video did not present new evidence against Do Kwon, Anonymous did say it was investigating Do Kwon's affairs from the time he entered crypto.

Anonymous is best known for taking down child porn sites, taking down various government websites, and messing with the Church of Scientology. This recent focus on crypto is not unwelcome — very few of us in this space would mind if Anonymous unmasked Do Kwon's activities prior to and during the collapse of one of crypto's largest ecosystems. This anon wonders, not too cynically, whether Anonymous' interest in Terra is in fact just a way of bringing attention to the Anontoken, which is supposedly “getting ready for the next phase”. Check the whitepaper in Google Drive if you don't believe it.
